Summary:

Many technology directors are initially tapped for the role because of their expertise in technology or instruction. However, they seldom receive specific and targeted training in how to be leaders and agents of change at the organisational level. However technology directors are increasingly being called upon to assume this mantle of leadership. Every organisation and situation is different, and there are no "silver bullets" or one-size-fits-all lists of rules, but knowing the right questions to ask can mean the difference between effective leadership and failure and frustration. The Technology Director's Guide to Leadership demonstrates the power of these great questions.
