Summary:

In the past, bullying in school had been dismissed as an unpleasant rite of passage. Today, educators, parents and children recognise the damage bullying can inflict, and schools are charged with creating a safe environment for all students.

Barton has created a guide for school leaders and educators that defines the bully-victim-witness relationship and offers guidelines for identifying bullying behaviors in the classroom. She explains how educators can intervene using conflict resolution techniques and methods for developing students' social skills. Because school leaders' ultimate goal is bully prevention, Barton provides strategies for creating an anti-bullying program within a safe school context. She also analyses anti-bullying initiatives and includes sample bullying prevention programs.

Key selling points:

- Identifies different types of bullying, including physical, verbal, relational and sexual.
- Encourages students' application of social skills and assertiveness to resolve bullying issues.
- Includes practical conflict resolution techniques.
